

andrew.chen@naaapsf.org

Andrew is Director of Membership for NAAAP-SF, where he helps lead NAAAP's membership outreach, recruitment, and retention efforts.

Andrew has previously been engaged in advisory, coaching, and mentoring for various non-profit / community organizations. He led the production of a documentary film for the Zigen Fund, an education non-profit, and has also consulted professionally on leadership and governance for several organizations, including the School of American Ballet at Lincoln Center and the Committee of 100. Andrew was a founding member of the China Law Digest, a non-profit online legal news journal edited by a consortium of students, researchers, and scholars, and also previously served as a house adviser at Harvard College, coaching students on post-college career plans. He co-taught a core curriculum class on race and ethnicity in American politics as a TF in the college, and was a conference director and trip director for the Asia Law Society at the law school, where he co-organized the largest annual conference on Asian business in North America in 2006, and led a 15-person delegation to Taiwan that met privately with both Taiwanese presidential candidates in 2007.

Andrew is currently a private equity investment professional at Huntsman Gay Global Capital. Prior to Huntsman Gay, he worked for McKinsey & Company in New York City, serving clients on issues relating to strategy, organization, and governance.

Andrew read history at the University of Texas and law at Harvard Law School. He was born and raised a southerner and has deep affection for his native Texas barbeque. In his spare time, Andrew voraciously reads fiction, history, biographies, memoirs, the Times, the New Yorker, and the Journal, and attempts to inundate friends with organized social events that revolve heavily around food -- either eating it or cooking it.